I have not heard of a method that would be as effective as hydrologic separation. Although it would be expensive and damage the local shipping and charter boat industries, infection of the Great Lakes with Asian carp that end up doing well in the waters could be catastrophic. Political considerations should not get in the way; it should be done for the benefit of the Great Lakes and the industries that revolve around them in the entire region, not just Chicago. Bite the bullet and implement hydrologic separation now before it's too late.
