We have seen a lot of invasive species enter the midwest woods and waters. We have watched until they now cover every rock on the bottom of the great lakes and devour enter species of hardwood. It seems to me the Asian carp rank as one of the largest potential 'eco-changers' yet. We are in a crisis period to prevent their great lakes invasion. When in a crisis, most would take even low probability actions in the short term while studying to find a long term solution. I want to know that my gov will DO something in the short term, even though it might be somewhat costly and/or disruptive to the flow of material. Please focus on action. We do not have 5 years!!
